Larger Lamb Crop Needed in Oregon

"One of the big problems of the sheep business in this state is that the breeders are not getting a large enough lamb crop," says H. A. Lindgren, Oregon State college specialist. "The state of Washington reports an average of 120 per cent lambing while the average for this state is only 80 to 90 per cent. More attention must be paid to breeding and lambing time. Ewes giving a large amount of milk and having a good heavy fleece with lots of quality together with conformation is what makes the sheep pay."

"This state has very good marketing conditions for both sheep and cattle providing they are handled correctly. Oregon is strictly a Lamboulette state. Idaho and Washington are looking to this state for fine wool breeding stock, thus affording an excellent market for breeding ewes. In Portland the market demands 2500 head of cattle per week which can be supplied by breeders of this state providing their cattle are put on the market regularly in good condition, which is possible."

If seed corn has been dried to around 15 per cent moisture it can be safely shelled and graded, ready for us next Spring. It is not necessary to keep the corn on the cob until spring as seed corn containing 15 per cent or less moisture is easily kept in sacks.

Potatoes treated with corrosive sublimate, the recommended treatment in Oregon, should be treated while still dormant or before they have sprouted. Badly sprouted potatoes if treated are given a shorter dip, or treated by some other method.
