Publisher of Oregon City Enterprise Ex-President of National Editorial Association, and former American Minister

When Hal Hoss came to Oregon City, a gangling youth, about fifteen a substantial foundation for suc-cess. His experience in newspaper work at that time was somewhat rudimentary, but it had the advantage of variable elements in that it commenced at the bottom and progressed upward through the several channels of the editorial departments and into the business office where he proceeded to make the most of opportunity. It was not for him a long step to a position of re-sponsible management, in which he coupled the qualities of initiating policies with those of carrying them to a sure termination. Over a per-iod of six years of newspaper direction, he developed steadily, building good will, which is the most valuable of newspaper assets, for the property with which he was identifled, and forming close and lasting contacts throughout the state.

Occupied as he was in a place that demanded constant applica-tion, Mr. Hoss shook irksome details from his shoulders and tied into his job an active appreciation of public service. He became a worker for the brothers of the class, acting indefatigably for their interactions acting indefatigably for their interactions acting indefatigably for their interactions without expectation or hope of reward. It was only natural that of reward. It was only natural that attention paid to breeding and attention paid to breeding attention paid to breeding and attention paid to breeding attention paid to br tions which he filled acceptably, and it was inevitable that his activities, as their scope broadened with the scope broadened with the scope broadened with as their scope broadened, would be accorded recognition which came to him in the form of an urgent keting conditions for both sheep invitation to join, as private secretary to the governor, the state administration. These facts may be construed as arguments for the nomination and election of Hal Hoss for secretary of state. He has become a personality. His friends are not giving his candidacy perfunctory support, but they are enthusiastically urg-
