NATIONAL AFFAIRS

Written for This Paper by FRANK P. LITSCHERT

We have heard a great deal during the past few weeks about whispering in the campaign. It has been stated that personalities have been handed about and insidious literature circulated. Some of the personal charges have been spoken in tones much louder than a mere whisper. A personal campaign of this sort is always to be deplored. The arousing of personal prejudices is undoubtedly against the best interests of the state. It leads a great many people away from the real issues of the campaign and toward casting their ballots for personal and not political reasons. The ideal campaign would of course be the one which could be waged on pure principle, away from personalities and prejudices of every kind, so that the people could weigh the issues calmly and cast their ballots accordingly.

Perhaps this is too much to expect so long as people remain human, and subject to the prejudices of humanity. True it is, however, that we ought to look toward the ideal as much as possible. But it is not to be understood, because of the outbreak of whispering and prejudice in the present campaign that we are entering a new political era. On the contrary we are rather reverting to our earlier ways as a people.

There has always been more or less whispering and a great deal of prejudice in every campaign. This has not always been religious prejudice. More often it has been political prejudice which would restrain a man from supporting a principle which he thought right and proper, because it was not proposed by the political party of his fathers. Then there has been race prejudice, too, a great deal of it. No political student will deny that racial prejudice has often changed the history of our country.

Bitter though the personalities may become in the present campaign, they will not become so bitter as have the personalities of many previous campaigns. For one thing the people are not so politically sensitive as formerly, and not so prone to take stock in political personalities. In the earlier days of the republic party feeling ran a great deal higher, and party prejudice was much bitterer than it is today. One has only to think back over his history to become convinced of this fact. In the early days statesmen of the first rank employed literary hacks to vilify their opponents and to "make bad medicine" against them that could be used in the campaign. To make use of slanderous personal attacks, and to start waves of whispering was considered one of the best forms of political strategy. Attacking the private character of the fellow in the other political camp was not at all unusual. Often personal encounters resulted.

We all know that bitter personal political feeling led to one famous duel early in our history as a republic. This was the meeting of Alexander Hamilton and Aaron Burr in which the former was killed. Fist fights and other forms of personal combats were much more common in the early times than today. Now the orators get pretty bitter at times as they warm to their task on the platform but generally they perform their duties with more or less regard to the niceties of the occasion. The very fact that personal attacks have gen-
