Steam That Has Fourteen Lives

What a giant of power is the steam locomotive as it thunders up the grade.

In the generating plant of your electric light and power company are power giants of another kind—softly humming turbines with the strength of a thousand locomotives on their shafts.

Not so much as a wisp of steam escapes. Rather, each jet of steam is made to multiply its power fourteen times. Not until the last ounce of its energy is exhausted is it released, and even then its heat is used to warm the water for the boilers.

Every detail in the operation of your electric light and power company is planned to yield the utmost in efficiency and economy.

That is why the modern electric motor can pull the load of other engines many times its size at but a fraction of their operating cost.

That is why the modern factory and the modern home can take advantage of the electrical miracles of our scientific age at a cost which puts the power of electricity within the reach of all.
