Barley Grades Important

"If you are handling barley, know your grades," says D. D. Hill of the farm crops department of Oregon "Not only can the growers and the dealers use these Federal standards as a basis for their contracts, but by proper consideration of the grading factors involved, the grower can often improve the quality of the product he sends to market.

Unlike federal grades for other grains, barley grades indicate the quality of the grain for two different purposes, and are therefore more difficult to apply, making a knowledge of the grading factors involved essential to a proper interpretation of the standards, says Mr. Hill. The term "choice," for in-stance, is of value mainly for the maltser, as it indicates a low percentage of skinned and broken kernels, but barley which is degraded because of this factor is just as good and sometimes better from the feed standpoint.

The second and third classes ap ply particularly to western barley, including all the 6-row barley and all the white 2-row barley grown west of the Rocky mountains. The fourth class, which is relatively unimportant, includes all the black barley, and in the first class comes white barley grown east of the Rockies. Test weight is an important factor in all cereal grades. The minimum allowed in No. 1 western bar-ley is 45 pounds, while in No. 1 2-row it is 47 pounds. In all other grades ranging from one to five the 2-row standards are from two to three pounds heavier. Barley which is not threshed cleanly and which has pieces of beards adhering usually has a low test weight, says Mr. Hill.

Harvesting with combines will produce drier grain than other methods, provided the grain is not cut too early, says the Oregon experiment station, as grain too ripe o be cut with a binder may be cut with a combine without waste. As standing grain will fill better than grain in the shock, ripe grain, cut with a combine, will be lower in moisture content, higher in protein, and the danger of heating will be

The standard remedy for eradicating cockroaches is sodium fluoride dust sprinkled in the cracks and crevices and other places inhabited by roaches, says the Oregon experiment station. A dust gun or blower is the most effective method of application. The roaches come out die in a few hours, and may be swept up and disposed of. Sodium fluoride is poisonous to humans as well, so is handled with care.
