CHRISTMAS business for 1929 was as good as a year before, according to reports from every part of the country. Merchants had expected a decline of 15 to 20 per cent. People who make it their business to analyze economic forces say that one reason why people did not cut down on their Christmas shopping after the Wall Street slump was because the President's business conferences in Washington had restored public confidence in the sound-ness of the Nation's industries and attempt to write an American story reassured the timid ones. If that is true, it is a good augury iar with the American language to for the new year. The President's make his characters talk as Amerpurpose in calling business leaders icans do. If American writers were to disclose their plans for the future and in urging Governors and not try to write stories about farm-Congress to accelerate the spending of public funds for roads, water ern farmers really act, think and ways, buildings and other public works, was the hope that the responses would prove so encouraging as to allay fear for the future. That turned out to be the case.

Mr. Hoover recognized the truth of Woodrow Wilson's famous statement that good times and bad times are usually the result of the mental attitude of the crowd. Business men of today understand that. If the mass of the people believes that things are going to go well, and proves that belief by spending money as freely as ever, then things do go well. If the majority is timid and hesitant about purchases and investments, things go badly and we investments, things go badly and we have hard times.

The year 1930 has hardly begun, but already the outlook seems brighter than it looked a couple of months ago. The public had real-ized more completely and speedily than had been hoped for that the United States is still moving steadi-ly toward its destiny, which is that of a nation in which neither poveral property. the least of its citizens except as the individual himslf so wills it.

There is more to this than simply protest against ugliness. There is sound dollars-and-cents value in beautiful roads. People who live on them not only take pride in them but can get more for their building sites. Towns which the tourist approaches thrugh arching trees and powers of flowers gain reputations and business thereby.

Europe is away ahead of America in roadside improvement. Not only ire its highways generally tree-lined but in some regions fruit and nut trees are planted, the harvest from which is sold to provide funds for road maintenance. That is an economy which might not operate so well in America, but there is nothing but time to prevent us from making every road beautiful.

BEAUTIFYING THE ROADSIDE.

The next step in highway improvement will be to make the roads more attractive. The first and most important object of road improvement is, of course, to make it easier to get from one place to another. But after that is done, attention ought to be given to the beautification of the roadside.

Several states have begun this work. In Massachusetts all new or relocated roads are made wide enough to provide for a belt of shade trees on each side and trees and shrubs are planted by the State
