INVADING THE FRONTIERS.

THE oldest civilization recorded by man existed in China. A not very complete record is had of how much this civilization was reflected upon Athens and Alexandria, later seats of the world's learning, but a complete picture of progress westward is the history from this date on. Rome succeeded Athens as the world's capital, and Caesar, the road builder of the ages, blazed the trail across the Alps which carried civilization northward and westward.

Who is not familiar with the story of exploration and conquest, in which Columbus, Sir Francis Drake, Roger Williams, Daniel Boone, Lewis and Clark, and our own Dr. Whitman, played leading roles in bringing this civilization, enriched through its advancement, to its last frontier—our very dooryard?

How much did this march of progress depend upon the roads of Caesar? That is impossible to say.

The fact worth noting is that these marvels of engineering, remains of which may be seen even today in France and England, permitted the moving of vast armies of men, that otherwise would have been impossible, and at least hurried the development of a greater civilization in western Europe.

Caesar was one of the world's outstanding trail blazers. There have been innumerable others, in the wake of whom has followed the development of an ever greater civilization. Skyscrapers, wonders of the modern world, have reared their heads above great cities in a land unknown, except to the natives and possibly certain leg-end-famed Norsemen, before Columbus. Today this land has become the world's banking house, a beehive of industry, looked to for guidance even by those aforementioned centers of learning.

The first frontiers of America have become crowded with people, among whom even today are those who hearken to Horace Greeley's "Go west, young man, go west." Since this admonition of America's great seer, transcontinental railroads have spanned the land from Atlantic to Pacific, and automobiles are rolling from coast to coast over hard-surfaced highways, to say nothing of the flying ships, speeding the race of civilization westward. The last frontier, looked to as the land of golden opportunity is being built.

As the tide of human advancement gathers force, it makes new avenues into less developed sections. Even as generations of settlers starved attempting to cool the hot winds of western Kansas before that section was made one of the country's great wheat producing areas, so have other human efforts been seemingly blasted before deserts were reclaimed in California, where now thousands of people live contentedly and prosperously from the rich productivity of the once desolate land. Is it too much to vision the time, in the not far distant future, when the waters of the mighty Columbia will be thrown upon the vast sand wastes surrounding them; when the north end of our own country will be made a veritable garden to temper the hot winds that in season now play havoc with crops of the upper country, and in turn make the upper country, too, more productive?

Road blazers make roads over which the civilized world marches on. New frontiers are invaded; new industries started. Man with his modern tools builds rapidly.

One road now projected will make more accessible, and stimulate interest in, a great hydro-electric project—the Umatilla Rapids. This road will probably do more to hurry along the project than any other one thing. The desert sands surrounding the Columbia may be made to bloom, even as they now do in small degree, sooner than they now do.

That road is the Wallula cut-off, one of the greatest boons to eastern Oregon.

Sheep Shearing Pool Urged in Washington
Washington sheepmen will join in united action to confront the problem offered by sheep shearers, according to Thomas J. Drumheller, president of the Washington Woolgrowers Association, in his talk at the opening of the 36th annual convention of the organization in Walla Walla, Wash., Monday. Drumheller said "sheep shearers had been trimming the sheep owners, as well as the sheep."

Drumheller urged pooling all sheep in the state for shearing purposes, drawing up a scale of wages, fair to both shearers and owners, and having sheep owners sign an agreement to abide by it. Schedule of shearing would be arranged so that fleeces would be cut when most convenient for owners and shearers would be assured steady work.

The matter was referred to special committee, headed by H. Stanley Coffin of Yakima, which is to report tomorrow.

More than 300 wool growers and their wives attended the convention which ends tomorrow night.

Charles L. Mackenzie of Colfax brought up the matter of taxing grazing land and sheep, urging concerted action with recommendations to be brought to the attention of the county assessors, who hold their annual meeting in Yakima next week, and a committee was named to work out schedule. Assessments are too high, he stated.

the week for its personal items, country correspondence, the homey editorial and the equally interesting news of the bargain sales at the local stores.

Professor Byrne believes that the so-called "passing" of the country weekly is instead a mere consolidation process resulting in fewer and better weeklies.

"There was a period during which the small town newspaper seemed to be smothering under the increasing circulation of the large city dailies," he pointed out. "But the city dailies do not and cannot devote space to matters of immediate interest to the small town and surrounding country. In this field the weekly has no competition."

Washington Approving Grain Marketing Plan

The cooperative grain marketing plan as outlined in the program of the federal farm board is winning favor with the Washington Wheat farmers, according to F. J. Wilmer, of Rosalia, president of the North Pacific Grain Growers Inc.

"The response has been so general that we have quit worrying about the farmers' attitude," said Wilmer, "and are now concerned about the responsibilities assumed."

The executive committee of the North Pacific Grain growers met in Spokane January 12, with a session of the entire committee to follow, probably February 1, also in Spokane.

A shallow dish is best for baking custards, so that the material may finish cooking in the center without overcooking at the sides. The dish is set in a pan of warm water in the oven, but the water is not allowed to boil. A watery custard indicates too long cooking, too high temperature, or both.
