Dallas—The 10,750 acres of Italian prunes growing in Polk county are likely to produce bigger and better fruit this year because of the excellent job of pruning that most of the growers are doing, according to J. R. Beck, county agent, who has had occasion to visit many of these orchards recently as well as in past years. Chief reasons for this, Mr. Beck says, are the low labor costs and the increasing realization on the part of the growers that there is more money in fewer and larger prunes, which can be obtained by the "thinning out" type of pruning.
