How Nurses Help Prevent Disease

OFTEN it takes a great man to see a perfectly obvious thing. For years patients with tuberculosis had been attending clinics for diagnosis and treatment before anybody thought to investigate their home conditions, or to help improve them, or to teach patients how to live for the benefit of their own health and to prevent their being a source of infection to others. It remained for no less a man than Sir William Osler, at that time Professor of Medicine at the Johns Hopkins Medical School, Baltimore, Maryland, and one of the outstanding physicians of his time, to realize that in tuberculosis prevention much could be achieved by going into the homes of patients.

Dr. Osler never was a man to evade an issue or to shade an adjective. In a public meeting in Baltimore he said: "My dear, long-suffering, patient, hopelessly inert fellow citizens. For 10,000 consecutive years, in our midst, we are doing nothing. Mr. Mayor and fellow citizens, not one solitary thing that a modern civilized community should do."

Personally securing a fund from friends, Dr. Osler instituted a systematic visitation of patients by one of his women medical students. This was in 1899. In 1900 a report on the home condition of 190 cases of tuberculosis showed appalling conditions. This was the first scientific investigation ever made of the domestic and social factors surrounding the disease.

Soon it became apparent that more regular visitation was needed than could be expected of a medical student. A nurse for this special work was appointed in 1903. By 1906 there were 34 nurses in nine cities. Now there are 7,115 in the United States, confining their efforts entirely to the important and perfectly obvious job which Osler was the first to see—the vital need of a nurse's help in the home to solve the problems of domestic detail which are important in healing the patient and safeguarding other members of the family from danger.

Miss Mary Healey of The Dalles spent the week end in Boardman. She left Monday for Portland to attend the graduation exercises of her aunt, Nora Hughes, who is in nurses' training at St. Vincent's hospital.
