The Ten Comr dus 20:12-21

The final six Commandments in the Decalogue are directed toward society, outlining man's obligation to his fellows.

The fifth Commandment sounds archaic in a day of severe tension between the older and younger generations. Taking unfair advantage of their freedom, children are sometimes loath to admit that there can be any merit in the ideas of their How refreshing to turn elders. from flippant irreverence toward one's parents thoughtlessly voiced by representatives of the "younger to that heartfelt veneration of Thomas Carlyle, crying out to his dead mother, "Oh, plous mother, kind, good, brave and truthful soul as I have ever found in this world!" It seems unnecessary to stress the sixth Commandment, "Thou shalt not kill," in Church circles. Yet Christians very rarely delib-Row County. National Warehouse Cor-National Warehouse Corerately commit murder, they are a party to those subtle forces that exact a heavy toll in human life. Last year thirty-four thousand persons were killed in the United States by motor vehicles. Also, think of those fated for a premature death through under-nourishment because of unemployment. Remember, too, the victims of that relic of barbarism, capital punish And then call to mind the millions sacrificed on the altar of Mars.

In this age of domestic tension and wrecked homes, due in large measure to unwholesome over-em-phasis upon the physical delights of the sex relationship, the protest of the seventh Commandment against adultery is most welcome. We sure ly need a new conscience concerning marriage, a fresh emphasis upon the necessity of mutual loyalty and forbearance.

The eighth Commandment, condemning stealing, is a reminder that al things belong to God and are held in trust by His children. For one man to take more than his rightful share of goods is to rob God Who is no respecter of persons.
