Change mighty slow

Miss Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor, said the other day that more than two thousand persons had written with elaborate schemes to change the whole social system. Probably never before have so many folk all over the world be bus making plans to remodel the world. Nothing is easier than to make an ideal plan; nothing is harder than to induce human beings to follow

It takes from three to a thousand a people. What is needed now is something that will work next month, not next century. It would be a good plan, for example, if the relations of industry and agricul-ture could be readjusted so that every factory worker would have a piece of land to fall back on, but the present generation of factory workers doesn't know how to live on the land,

The last thing Americans want, it seems to me, is to be compelled by law to do anything to which they are not naturally inclined. I don't think highly of any scheme of social reform which is not the product of the evolutionary interplay of natural forces.
