lower the hot jars into boiling hot water which comes one inch over the tops of the jars. Bring the water to a boil again as soon as possible and keep it at a rolling boil for three hours. It may be necessary to add more boiling water to take the place of what boils away. Letting the fire die down will lower the temperature in the jars. At the end of the processing period, remove jars, seal immediately and invert to test for leakage, except with self-seal jars.

The cause of the spoilage of home canned beets that resulted in three deaths at Dayton, Wash., recently was inadequate heat, as the beets had been boiled only one hour in the jars, reports to Miss Case indicate. These botulism infected beets were also eaten without boiling after taking them from the can. A safe rule is to boil all home canned meats, fish and non-acid vegetables 15 minutes before tasting after opening the jars.

Heat, More Heat Gives More Safety to Canning

Happy is the home canner whose canned products always keep. The four essentials in the keeping quality of canned goods are adequate heat in processing to kill the bacteria, yeasts and molds; second, an airtight seal that remains airtight; third, fresh sound products to start with, and lastly, cleanliness, says Lucy A. Case, extension specialist in foods and nutrition at Oregon State college.

Beans are more likely to keep if they are boiled five minutes before being placed, still hot, in the jars. All of these hot methods of handling help to satisfy the first rule of successful canning, adequate heat, says Miss Case. She gives further directions as follows:

Four the boiling hot water in which the beans were pre-cooked over the hot beans to one-half inch from top of the jar, add one-half teaspoon salt to each pint and partially seal. Keep the jars standing in hot water until all are ready to process. Then place them in the hot cooker, preferably a pressure cooker, and process at 10 pounds pressure, 35 minutes for pint jars and 40 minutes for quart jars. The hot water bath is not recommended, but if it must be used,
