E HEAR a great deal these days about the passing of the era of opportunity, in which every man had a fair chance to gain at least a living, regardless of what others might do.

We are not at all sure that opportunity was ever quite so broad as that, and we are still less sure that it is true that the gates of opportunity have been closed upon ter. men of ability. Lesson for September 10th. I Samuel 18-20. Golden Text: Proverbs 17:17.

History records some noble friendships. In ancient times there lived Damon and Pythias, more recently, we think of Shelley and Keats, a friendship immortalized in Shelley's noble elegy, "Ado-nais," and Tennyson and Hallam, whose golden affection for one another is celebrated in the music of "In Memoriam." Our lesson deals with as fine a friendship as any of these, that of David and Jonathan. So com-pletely adapted were they to one other that they grew together as one soul. Both were courageous, gifted, and noble-hearted. than loved David," wrote Charles Kingsley, "because his soul was was like the soul of David. Because he was modest, he loved David's modesty; because he was brave, he loved David's courage; because he was virtuous, he loved David's virtue; he saw that David was all that he was himself." Dr. Mattheson calls Jonathan "one of the sweetest souls that has ever breathed." He is "a rainbow in a storm," full of tenderness and generosity. Certainly his career is all beauty and sunshine, avoiding the dark blots that mar the biography of David. He was a popular Crown Prince, trusted implicitly by his father. All the qualities needed to make friendship a success, fidelity, love, disinterestedness, and self-sacrifice, were present in him. Now note that there was no envy in Jonathan. He was the logical successor to the throne. David was his rival. Yet he was not in the slightest degree jealous. His love for David was so complete, so un-selfish that all thought of his superior claim to preeminence was entirely smothered. His perfect devotion is well expressed in that vivid verse, "Jonathan stripped himself of the robe that was upon him, and gave it to David, and his garments, even to his sword, and to his bow, and to his girdle." No wonder David loved him, and composed a magnificent lament in his "O Jonathan, my brother! You were my dear delight, your
