Certification Service Is Aid to Oregon Farmers

Field inspection of the 1934 grass and clover seed crops, small grains and potatoes and other crops for certification is now under way thru-out the state, reports from county agents and extension service specialists show. These inspections are made to determine purity, trueness to variety, freedom from noxious weeds and seed borne diseases and other points.

This crops certification service has been of major importance in aiding Oregon farmers to build up a reputation as producers of high quality seed, says F. L. Ballard, vice-director of the extension service. It has been largely responsible for the growth of the small seed production business of the state from a half million dollars a few years ago to between one and two million at the present time.

Oregon, for example, is the only state that produces Ladino clover seed in volume, much of which is certified. Without field inspection, Ladino seed cannot be told from ordinary white clover seed. The acreage of Ladino in Oregon has increased from 134 acres in 1926 to more than 11,000 acres this year, and the seed of this giant white clover is finding an expanding market in many states. Bent grass seed production, another development of recent years in Oregon, has also been materially aided by certification, and this state now produces approximately 90 per cent of the domestic seed supply of this grass.

Grain certification work was carried on in 22 Oregon counties, involving the inspection of 4,966 acres of wheat, oats and barley last year, according to a report by E. R. Jackson, extension agronomist, and in addition 4,050 acres of alfalfa, Ladino clover, red clover, bent grass and English rye grass were inspected and certified. A total of 1431 acres of potatoes in 16 counties also received certification.

New certification rules and application blanks have just been issued by the extension service and can be obtained at the office of any county agent. Growers desiring certification this year are urged to make application immediately.
