Engine Adjustment Beats Fuel Dopes Say OSC Men

Engineering research men at Oregon State college are inclined to discount the claims of "super power" or great economy for particular brands or grades of gasoline. Instead they say that careful and satisfactory carburetor adjustment in automobiles will affect both economy and performance much more than ordinary differences in gasolines.

These conclusions are set out in a highly technical research bulletin which deals with the interpretation of exhaust gas analysis. Four years ago the O. S. C. engineering experiment station issued a bulletin explaining a gas analysis method of adjusting carburetors since when other results of such research have been published elsewhere. The new bulletin seeks to coordinate and bring up-to-date these findings for the guidance of mechanical engineers. The publication is already in great demand among educational institutions and industrial concerns. Unfortunately there is no single test that a consumer can apply to determine the quality of motor fuel, say the authors, S. H. Graf, G. W. Gleason and W. H. Paul. Physical and chemical properties that indicate motor fuel quality are volatility, purity and anti-knock value, but these are so related that improvement in one is usually at the expense of the other. Gasoline "dopes" and substances designed to be added to the fuel proved under test to be of little or no value, the bulletin says. No substance has been reported that approaches the tetra-ethyl lead fluid in giving anti-knock properties at the same economy. There is a limit, however, to the extent of anti-knock characteristics that are of practical value. Poland China base, also Roderick-McLean disc to trade for what have you. F. E. Mason, Ione, Ore.
