To Pasture Sheep on Coast Cut-Over Lands

Another link connecting the livestock industry of eastern and western Oregon is being forged this summer with the moving of upwards of 20,000 head of sheep from the Columbia basin to the logged-off lands of Columbia county for summer pasturage.

This past winter interest increased in the possibility of developing a farm beef feeding industry in the Willamette valley as profitable outlet for western Oregon hay and eastern Oregon feeder cattle.

Utilization of north-western Oregon logged-off lands for sheep grazing holds considerable promise, according to a report on the project just made by H. A. Lindgren, extension livestock fieldman at Oregon State college. To answer many inquiries concerning it Lindgren assembled information from all parties concerned including the county officials, forest service and the railroad. This has been prepared in mimeographed form for general distribution.

"This planned grazing use of the cut-over lands in Columbia and Clatsop counties, if as successful as past experiments indicate it will be, should bring to the owners of the cut-over lands a tidy sum each year toward meeting the financial responsibilities now involved," the report says. "Taxes and fire patrol charges can in a considerable measure be covered by the fee charged for grazing, while the other expenditures involved in handling of the stock will leave additional money in the community."

"These returns unquestionably can be increased when it is definitely known how to secure full values from this type of range. The grazing of the stock will, in addition, reduce the fire hazard and the cooperation of owners and herders can be made effective in fire patrol and in the handling of fires."

"This grazing use fits in very nicely with the more general plan of land use and the future restoration of a timber crop together with the stabilization of the whole economy of the area on a sound basis."
