A Debt Settled?

AT PITTSBURG, Candidate Roosevelt said in effect, "We have paid the soldier's bonus, and that problem is out of the way." Without referring to the acts of President Roosevelt in forestalling payment, which relieves him of any credit for having the welfare of the veterans at heart, it may be asked in what form did his congress finally sanction such payment, over-riding the president's veto? If your memory is good, you will remember it was not in cash, but in bonds representing borrowed money that the veterans received payment. True, the veterans had the option of cashing the bonds forthwith, without interest. But the bonds are payable by the government in 1945 at 3 percent interest. Thus in paying the soldiers' bonus, the New Deal did not rid itself of a government obligation. It merely forestalled the day of payment, so that sons and daughters of veterans will share in paying their mothers' and daddles' debt for war

This is not the only trick the government played on the veterans in paying them for war service. They Heppner Commercial club last were once before permitted to borrow up to fifty percent on their adhad not repaid their loans when the ample supply for irrigating during a dry year.
