Quick Cooking Helps In Vegetable Uses

Modern production, shipping and storage methods have given the homemaker attractive fresh vegetables the year round, but even so the list of those available in winter is not as complete as at other times of the year.

Quick cooking preserves both an attractive appearance and full food value, while enhancing the flavor. Not all vegetables can be prepared alike, however, Miss Case points out. Following are some suggestions for preparing three common winter vegetables:

Brussels Sprouts: Wash and trim. Cook in more than enough boiling water to cover, salted at rate of 1½ teaspoons of salt to quart of water. Cook rapidly about 10 minutes or until tender when tested with fork. Drain off all water, and season with hot cream or medium white sauce, poured over the sprouts so as not to break their shape.

Broccoli: Remove all but tender inside leaves and wash and separate flowers or sections. Cook and season same as described for Brussels sprouts. Broccoli is attractive cooked whole and served with white sauce covering part of the head and decorated with paprika on the white sauce. Broken or separated broccoli is usually cooked in about 12 minutes, but the leaves are sometimes given a longer cooking and used as greens.
