Wehmeyer Tells of Ranger School

The annual ranger training school is being held at Hemlock ranger station in the Wind River valley, Skamania county, Wash. The nearest postoffice is located at the little town of Carson, ten miles away, at the mouth of Wind river. F. F. Wehmeyer, local ranger in attendance, reports:

At Hemlock there is the regular set-up for the West side ranger district, consisting of warehouses, residences, bunk houses, offices and other necessary buildings. In addition, there is the experiment station and nursery. At the latter some three million trees are raised annually for planting denuded areas in the national forests of Region Six.

Close by we have the school buildings, consisting of class and assembly hall and dormitory. Altogether

Choir Boys Prepare for Easter Services

NEW YORK . . . In spite of late snows and inclement spring weather, preparations for an early Easter are well underway. These choir boys of Grace Church are busy rehearsing their joyous anthems for the special Easter services.

there are probably fifty or more buildings, besides the local CCC camp. The school buildings are modern to the last degree with electric lights, steam heat and all other conveniences.

This year's class of rangers was selected from the older members of the service and the average period of service is over 15 years. More than half the men are near the 25-year service group.

The classes are based on the informational conference method and cover twelve of the activities coming under a ranger's supervision. Grazing administration, fire control, recreational activities, state and private forestry, timber management, land uses, are a part of the course. The 30 rangers present were divided into classes of ten men each. Special instructors in each subject covering from one day to four days depending upon its relative importance in a rangers daily work. The school covers a five-weeks' period. Eight hours per day is given to class, and with evening lectures and reference reading, tend to make a rather full day. Emphasis of the entire meeting is centered on what can be done as public servants to better serve the public. Social security of dependent communities is being seriously studied as a part of governmental duty.

Schooling is not being confined to the rangers. As we move out near the first of April, a class of improvement foremen move in for instruction.
