

Pine Beetle Inroads Being Checked

Man's counter attack against the diminutive pine beetle, arch destroyer of pine forests in Oregon and Washington, has made important progress in the past year, according to A. J. Jaenicke in charge of regional insect control work for the U. S. forest service.

CCC tree troopers under forest service direction in the past year have halted beetle inroads on more than 100,000 acres of privately owned and national forest timber in the Deschutes national forest area near Bend, Oregon; on approximately 50,000 acres in the Ochoco national forest near Prineville, Oregon, and on about 30,000 acres near Bly, Oregon, in the Fremont national forest.

Similar beetle control projects have been completed by the CCC under the Indian Service on more than 100,000 acres of ponderosa pine timber on the Yakima Indian reservation in Washington; on large areas in the Warm Springs Indian reservation northwest of Bend, and on the Klamath reservation north of Klamath Falls in Oregon where work will be completed this month.

Beetle control on approximately 40,000 acres of Deschutes national forest timber southeast of Bend will be completed about May 15, according to Jaenicke. Jaenicke stated that the general situation is much better today than for several years.

Control work, costing in the neighborhood of a dollar an acre, necessitates systematic coverage of timber area sin which all infested trees are first marked and then cut, peeled and burned, or, if possible, logged, to remove all sources of further infestation.

Eliminate the factor of mechanical defects and the ratio of accidents declines. Control this menace that results from the negligence of car owners and a sizeable share of the answer to that ghastly question—"why were 354 persons killed on our state highways in 1936?"—will be found.

Car Inspection Cuts Accidents

Faulty, defective motor vehicle equipment is involved in more than 15 per cent of all fatal traffic accidents in Oregon.

The need for such periodic inspection is becoming more and more apparent to city and state officials, the motor association traffic safety examiners remark as they point to the "horrible example" of Portland, where before the required testing of motor vehicles was instituted late in 1936, fully half of the automobiles at large on the city streets were unfit to be driven, as 50 per cent of the cars tested had to be rejected at the Portland inspection station—many of these appearing several times before their basic safety devices could receive the seal of safe operation.

Good Cows Need Grain With Grass Corvallis—Feeding supplemental grain rations to cows on spring pasture may not seem economical right at the time, but when considered over the entire lactation period it is definitely shown to be economical, says I. R. Jones, associate professor of dairy husbandry at Oregon State college.

A cow in good flesh when turned on pasture may hold up in her production for a month or so, but in time she must decline in production to the level possible when eating grass alone, he says. To be of value, however, it is essential that the supplemental grain be fed from the start, because it is nearly impossible to restore the flow once it has been allowed to decrease considerably.

A balanced safety program is of equal importance with a balanced municipal budget, reminds the Oregon State Motor association.

PINE CITY

By BERNICE WATTENBURGER Miss Lenna Neill of La Grande spent Friday at the Lon Wattenburger and Jim Daly homes. Miss Neill has attended normal school for two years.

Mrs. Naomi Broderson and baby daughter accompanied Miss Audrey Moore home last week. Mrs. Broderson is better known as Naomi Moore.
