Trashy Follow Findings Adopted by League

Possibilities and limitations of trashy fallow proved to be a question attracting major interest at the recent annual meeting of the Eastern Oregon Wheat League. Reports of varied experiences by farmers and a preliminary report by D. D. Hill on research work being done on the subject, were added to the past experiences of the branch experiment station, resulting in recommendations endorsing the use of trashy fallow when properly handled.

"The use of trashy summer fallow is generally recognized as an effective means of helping to prevent losses of soil by erosion . . . and maintain soil organic matter and fertility," the report stated. "Trashy fallow does not differ in fundamental principle from the moisture and nitrate saving methods that have been widely used for many years. The tillage practices should be done at the same time and the fallow should be just as free of weeds as when all the straw is turned under.

"The proper method of trashy fallow will vary according to the conditions on the individual farm. In the lower yielding areas and on the lighter soils the mold board plow, with mold board removed or modified, will leave more trash on the surface than the one-way disc plow, and it will leave the soil in a more desirable cloddy condition. Where the one way disc plow is used under these conditions, the plow should travel at a slow rate of speed, two miles per hour, and not more than four or five inches deep. On heavy soils and in the higher yielding areas the one-way disc plow is suggested as a desirable implement. "The use of more straw spreaders is recommended in all except the low yielding areas," the report continues. "In regions of light stubble, pasturing tends to reduce the amount of stubble on the surface, hence should be done lightly if at all. There should be no burning of straw, as practically all wheat soils in the Columbia basin are low in organic matter. The accumulation of straw on the surface in high yielding fields may necessitate spring planting. A rod weeder is recommended as a desirable tillage implement for the cultivation of trashy fallow."

Canned Pea Supplies Diverted to Relief

Canned peas are the latest Oregon product to be purchased by the Federal Surplus Commodities corporation in an attempt to improve market conditions. The AAA recently announced that it will purchase canned peas for distribution to persons on relief in an effort to reduce a prospective heavy carry-over that would affect the 1938 crop. Secretary Wallace has also approved an extension of the time limit on the diversion program for hops to January 31. The FSCC recently stepped into the pear market, purchasing 45 cars of Medford fruit to ease market gluts.
