Conditioned Air Factor in Good Health

Oregon State College—Preparing air inside of houses, office buildings and other gathering places for the use of human beings is coming to be just as important a process as preparing food and water for safe use by the public, it was brought out at the first air conditioning conference held at Oregon State college by the mechanical engineering department. More than 200 specialists in the building trades and others interested in the subject attended the conference.

One speaker pointed out that recent tests in office buildings have shown that modern air conditioning equipment will sometimes pay for itself in a little more than two years through the reduction in loss of time from illness.

People would not think of using contaminated food or water, and yet only within the last two decades has there been any material progress in real air conditioning.

Engineering staff members at the college where a research laboratory for domestic heating and air conditioning is being developed, said that many installations being made under the name of air conditioning are far from being complete. Real air conditioning, they said includes heating, cooling, humidifying, dehumidifying, purifying and air movement.
