Way Cleared for Wheat Loans to Oregon Farmers

With the settlement of procedure tangles between the Reconstruction Finance corporation and the Pacific Northwest wheat warehouses, the way is now cleared for Oregon and other northwest farmers to obtain AAA loans on this year's wheat crop whether they have farm storage facilities or not.

This announcement is made by Edgar L. Ludwick, recently appointed state supervisor of wheat loans in Oregon, who reports practically all federally licensed warehouses in Oregon as well as important state licensed facilities on the approved list.

Difficulty arose over the fact that national regulations on storage of wheat covered by loans were not in line with established practices in the northwest. Some adjustment in the requirements as well as in the practices has eliminated what for a while threatened the progress of the loan program in this region.

The procedure in obtaining loans is for the grower to make application through his county AAA committee. In case of public storage of his wheat, the chief step is obtaining clearance on AAA compliance. Where farm storage is being used the wheat must be stored 30 days and the storage facilities must be passed upon by the county committee before the loan can be approved.

Interest in farm storage is heightened by the fact that the government will pay 7 cents a bushel for storage on the farm in case the grain is turned over next spring as settlement of the loan. This would pay a considerable share of the cost of new farm storage, it is pointed out.

State Supervisor Ludwick is maintaining headquarters at the AAA office at Oregon State college. He has had long experience both in grain and wool handling in the northwest. After serving as county agent three years in Idaho he did special grain work for the U. S. D. A., then was assistant manager for the Oregon Grain Growers cooperative, and following that was sales manager for the Colorado Grain Growers. For the past 12 years he was assistant manager of the North Pacific Co-operative Woolgrowers in Portland.

Independence is the most recent Oregon city to institute a drive against traffic offenders, according to Secretary of State Earl Snell. The Independence Enterprise reports that the city council has instructed the chief of police to put a halt to speeding along Monmouth and Main streets, a practice declared to have been responsible for several recent accidents.

Mr. and Mrs. D. S. Barlow were trading in town Monday from the Eight Mile farm.
