60 per cent of these birds destined to form the piece de resistance of Thanksgiving dinners the country over, will be western turkeys produced in the three Pacific coast states and in Utah and Colorado.

Annually, turkeys worth more than $6,000,000 are placed on the holiday market by farmers' cooperatives in 21 states, according to figures derived from the commodity study made as a part of the Farm Credit administration's nation-wide survey of farm cooperation. The turkeys are handled by 94 associations, some of which are federations of smaller co-ops, or cooperative sales agencies.

Utah farmers lead the nation in dollar volume of turkeys marketed cooperatively, with an output of close to $1,000,000. Colorado, with $789,000, is second; California routes birds worth $774,000 through cooperatives, and Oregon's volume is close behind at $734,000.

Marketed in more or less unorganized fashion in the past because of the brief, seasonal demand, turkeys have attained a new importance in the food marts of the country through cooperative effort. Cooperating farmers are making outstanding efforts to develop new "streamlined" birds bearing a maximum of meat with a minimum of waste. The co-ops have pioneered in advertising, standardization of their product, and attractive packaging. Also, they have led the industry in endeavors to popularize the "gobbler" as a year-round dish, meeting with considerable success in the hotel and restaurant trades.

Public ownership advocates broke even in their attempts to organize peoples utility districts in Oregon last week. Voters of Wasco county rejected the proposal while those on the upper McKenzie river approved the plan by a large margin. In Wasco county it was the city dwellers who defeated the utility district plan, their adverse majority more than offsetting the favorable majority returned by the rural districts.
