Ballard Lists Factors In Extension Work

Successful administration of extension work within a state seeks the furtherance of a well coordinated program in the interests of the farm population, rather than the mere attainment of high sounding statistical goals, F. L. Ballard, vice-director in charge of extension in Oregon, told the National Association of Land-Grant colleges in one of the principal speeches delivered at the recent convention in Chicago.

The invitation to Ballard to speak on "What Constitutes Effective Extension Administration Within a State," was generally recognized as a high compliment to the type of administration used in Oregon.

Ballard pointed out that any extension service must guard against the repetition of established and once successful activities to the point "where such walls of self-esteem are built up that the entire process is in a rut." He said that the first requirement in effectiveness is to recognize the necessity of periodic change.

In summing up, Ballard pointed out that three chief factors contribute to effective administration. These are, first, the extension service well established as the leading agency in assisting to develop and carry out a sound agricultural program. Second, a coordinated, well-trained personnel, with adequate compensation and recognized professional standing. Third, making the most of opportunities for maintaining sound and fair off-campus relationships which will be reflected in financial support and growth in proportion to the success achieved.

Annual Wild Life Conference to be At OSC Dec. 1 and 2

Careful consideration and discussion of Oregon's wild life problems by the various agencies concerned, with a view to finding successful solutions, is to be the aim of the third annual Oregon Wildlife conference to be held on the Oregon State college campus December 1 and 2, according to those in charge of arrangements. The meetings will be open to the public, with everyone interested in wild life invited to attend.

Among the featured out-of-state speakers will be Carl D. Shoemaker, secretary of the National Wildlife Federation and a former Oregonian, who will speak at the annual banquet Thursday night, as well as during the Thursday morning session; and J. C. Saylor, in charge of the division of wildlife refuges of the U. S. biological survey.

The conference will be opened by William J. Smith, Portland, president of the Oregon Wildlife federation, and Dr. George W. Peavy, president of the college, will give the address of welcome. Other speakers at the annual banquet will be Governor Charles H. Martin, honorary president of the Oregon federation; and Governor-elect Charles A. Sprague. E. F. Averill, past-president of the Oregon group, will be toastmaster. Another feature of the banquet program will be the showing of wildlife motion pictures by Dr. W. L. Finley, vice-president and regional director of the National Wildlife federation.

The first part of the Thursday afternoon program will be devoted to the mule deer problem of eastern Oregon, with representatives of the forest service, the livestock industry and the U. S. biological survey presenting their views on the subject. Later in the afternoon, Dr. Phillip A. Parsons of the State Planning board, will present the board's conservation program, and Dr. Finley will discuss the Pittman-Robertson bill, both under the general topic of "Oregon's Opportunity for the Future."

The Friday morning session will be given over to presentation and discussion of proposed legislation. Committee reports, election of officers and other business will come Friday afternoon, following talks by Mr. Shoemaker and H. H. Stage, secretary of the Oregon federation.

Burton H. Peck was in town Monday from the Lexington farm home. He returned to the county Sunday from Portland, where he attended sessions of the national grange convention.
