Oregon State Seeking Flying Training Unit

Oregon State College—Prospects are bright for establishment of a unit at Oregon State college of the new federal program for training civilian airplane pilots and mechanics, according to administrative officials here. The Portland chamber of commerce and other organizations have gone on record as favoring establishing such work at Corvallis.
It is understood that the new training units are to be established in connection with colleges already giving training in aeronautical engineering. Such work is well established here, although no vocational training is now given for pilots or mechanics.
B. F. Ruffner, associate professor of aeronautical engineering, and S. H. Graf, head of the department of mechanical engineering, are negotiating with federal officials over the possibility of getting federal aid for such work.
Grade school students in a Wisconsin school recently debated the desirability of automobiles as compared with horses and buggies, and decided in favor of the latter because they cause fewer fatalities, Secretary of State Earl Snell reports. However, the children were strongly in favor of the automobile provided the safety factor can be sufficiently increased.

Oregon Coops Lead in Frozen Food Industry

Four cooperative associations in Oregon and two in Washington are listed among 11 such organizations in the entire United States which are engaged in processing frozen pack fruits and vegetables, according to a survey made by J. A. Forehand, secretary of the Washington Packers, Inc., at Sumner, Wash.
Most of the experimental work in frozen pack methods carried on by public agencies has been conducted at the federal laboratory in Seattle and in the food products industries laboratory at Oregon State college.
The four Oregon cooperative associations and the pounds processed in 1937 as listed by Forehand, are the Apple Growers' association, Hood River, 29,000 pounds; Gresham Berry Growers', Inc., 5,400,000 pounds; Springbrook Packing company cooperative, 240,800 pounds, and Stayton Canning Company cooperative, 500,000 pounds. These four together accounted for 6,430,800 of the 28 million pounds processed in 1937.
"Frozen fruits and vegetables as an industry is still decidedly in its youth," said Mr. Forehand, "but I believe it will play an increasingly important role in the preservation of foods, and that in growing it will introduce many innovations in the transportation, storing and merchandising of foods."
Increasing acceptance of frozen food products has been noted on the part of hospitals, railroads, restaurants and steamship lines, in addition to individual home consumption.
