Deadline Set for Wheat Insurance Premium Payment

Saturday, April 29, is the deadline for payment of premiums on spring wheat insurance under the federal crop insurance plan, announces N. C. Donaldson of Corvallis, executive officer for the AAA farm program in Oregon.

A total of 839 Oregon farmers have applied for insurance on their wheat crops, says Clyde Kiddle, state crop insurance supervisor. Approximately 600 of them have paid their premiums, either in cash or in wheat.

Largest crop insurance policies in the state were those taken out last fall in Umatilla county by the farming enterprises supervised by Mac Hoke of Pendleton, said Kiddle. Three carloads of wheat were required to pay the premium on the 7766 acres insured. This is regarded as the largest crop insurance venture in the United States.

Second largest wheat insurance policy in Oregon was taken out recently by the Rietmann Bros. of Ione, in Morrow county, Kiddle stated. A total of 1607 acres was insured for 75 per cent of possible loss, at the rate of 1.6 bushels premium payment per acre.

The premium on the Rietmann Bros. policy cost them $1321, or the equivalent of 2571 bushels of No. 2 soft white wheat. In event of total loss of their crop they would receive 13,378 bushels of wheat or its cash equivalent.

The recently announced change in wheat acreage compliance rules to permit full payment where less than 80 per cent of the allotment is seeded will not allow growers to collect payments if they carry out no farming operations this year, warns N. C. Donaldson, AAA executive officer in Oregon.

A farm is not considered as being operated unless at least half of the crop land is being worked either in producing crops or maintaining summerfallow.

The new ruling will permit the earning of more payments by those who for any reason have been unable to seed 80 per cent of their allotment. The change came too late to affect many seeding practices in Oregon, however.

Twenty-five small automobiles, of the foot-pedal variety, were used in the "safety town" conducted in the Mansfield, Ohio, public parks last summer, when the principles of traffic safety were taught to youngsters of that city. A model intersection with miniature traffic lights, was used in showing the young motorists and pedestrians how to conduct themselves in traffic.
