Gasoline Differences Discussed by OSC Men

Oregon State College—The chief difference between so-called third structure gasoline and the regular, or premium, fuels is in volatility and anti-knock properties, rather than in any difference in purity or ability to deliver more miles per gallon, according to engineers at Oregon State college, who held a radio round table discussion on this subject recently.

"Many people think that third structure gasoline is inferior from the standpoint of containing impurities, but this is not the case," said George Gleeson, head of the chemical engineering department. "In fact, quite the reverse is true. It contains less sulphur and gum-forming material than the regular grades, and is about on a par in this respect with the premium gasolines."

What grade of gasoline will be most economical or more satisfactory will depend on the kind of motor and the kind of weather, it was brought out. Most engines will not start as easily on third structure, and neither will they warm up so quickly. Then, of course, this grade has definitely less anti-knock properties, making it less suitable for modern high compression motors.
