"SHRUBBING" TABOO

Washington, D. C., July 27—Tourists who dig up shrubs from government-owned land are headed for trouble under a bill which has passed the senate and is now in the house. The bill places the shrub-stealers in the same class with "any person, firm or corporation" who without lawful authority shall damage, sever or remove any timber, tree, shrub or other forest product upon any government lands, including ceded Indian lands, and lands within the O. & C. grant or the Coos Bay Wagon road grant. The act does not prevent a miner or farmer of clearing his land.

High USDA Officials See Oregon Work

Better understanding of regional problems serves as a cement to bind together the work of the United States department of agriculture at Washington and the land grant colleges, M. L. Wilson, under-secretary of agriculture, told officials of both branches at a gathering in Corvallis the last week in July.

Wilson and a score of other program-making and policy-forming men in the federal department of agriculture had stopped at Oregon State college in the course of a motor tour which started at Spokane and continued through Idaho, Washington, Oregon, and into California.

While in this state the visitors inspected work of the Soil Conservation service, Farm Security administration, bureau of agricultural economics, Agricultural Adjustment administration, and the O. S. C. extension service. Concerned primarily with the agencies assisting in land planning, the visitors were particularly interested in the progress which has been made in this state in adapting the type of agriculture to the needs of the region. William A. Schoenfeld, dean of agriculture, and F. L. Ballard, vice-director of extension, explained the cooperative relationships in this state.
