Tomatoes Great Source of Most Needed Vitamins

If you're a vitamin fan get more tomatoes to can.

This is the suggestion of Miss Lucy A. Case, extension nutrition specialist at O. S. C., who calls attention to the fact that the tomato almost spans the vitamin alphabet.

One medium-sized ripe tomato will furnish about half a day's requirement for vitamin C (ascorbic acid) and about one-fifth of the vitamin A needs for the day. In addition it will contribute some Vitamin B1, vitamin G, and the pellagra preventative vitamin.

A supreme court decision back in 1893 held that a tomato is a vegetable, even though botanically it is a fruit. Regardless of that, it is dietetically one of the cheapest and best sources of food rich in vitamins.

Tomatoes are one of the vegetables easiest to can successfully at home, Miss Case points out. And, according to a recent experiment of the federal bureau of home economics, tomatoes put up by recommended home-canning methods, even though they lose some of their vitamin C in storage after canning, still rate as a good source of that vitamin.

Unlike most vegetables, tomatoes are an acid food. Therefore they need not be processed in a steam pressure canner. Instead, processing in a water bath for a reasonable length of time will kill any trouble-making bacteria that happen to be present.

Ideal tomatoes for canning are firm, ripe, of a fine red color, and free from decay. Skin the tomatoes and core them, then pack into glass jars or tin cans. Be careful to remove every bit of the green core which might cause spoilage if left in the tomato. To can them "cold pack," put them as closely as possible into the containers, preferably in tin to prevent access of air. Add 1 teaspoon salt for every quart, fill the can or jar with tomato juice, then process in boiling water 45 minutes for pint and quart glass jars and 35 minutes for No. 2 and 2½ tin cans.
