Attorney General I. H. Van Winkle this week held that the agricultural marketing act of 1935 gives the state department of agriculture power to enforce reasonable regulations for the protection of the people of Oregon from defective or unhealthy farm products regardless of the state of their origin. The opinion was reportedly requested in preparation for a test suit asking for enforcement of the act. The department of agriculture has not been actively enforcing the act because the legislature failed to appropriate any funds for that purpose. All fees and licenses collected under the act are supposed to be used for its administration and enforcement but the legislature, under the budget law, must make a specific appropriation before they can be used. Van Winkle said also that if the department licenses retailers it cannot except growers who market their own produce on their own farm premises.
