U.O. Student Writes Oregon Farm Report

University of Oregon, Eugene, Nov. 22—The Oregon section of a report prepared by the Northwest Regional Council, "Some Legal Aspects of Farm Tenancy in Oregon and Washington," a copy of which was received here today, was written by Miss Betty Brown, Hubbard, third year law student at the University of Oregon.

The report sets out, in non-technical language the general rules based on statute and case law governing farm tenancy and is expected to be of special use to supervisors of the Farm Security administration, field employees of the U. S. Department of Agriculture, planning committees and various others.

FSA Lends 4200 State Farmers Cash to Start

More than 4200 Oregon farm families have been aided by the Farm Security administration in becoming established on farms capable of producing them a living, according to a summary report of FSA activities given recently by Clifford Smith, state director of rural rehabilitation. Smith spoke to a conference of extension specialists at O. S. C.

Out of a total of $4,334,857 loaned to people who had no other credit available, $1,417,870 has already been repaid, Smith reported. About 500 loans have been paid in full while only 80, or about 2 per cent, have been written off as failures.

Loans under this arrangement are still being made, although there has been about 25 per cent less call this year than last, the state director said. He explained that only families that have no regular credit facilities are eligible for these rehabilitation loans, and then only when investigation shows a reasonable chance for them to succeed if "put on their feet."

When such a loan is made, a definite farm management plan, including a practical cropping system, is drawn up which follows the findings of the experiment station and extension service as well as the experience of successful farmers in the community. Repayment is planned on the basis of estimated income from following this sound farming program.
