The proposal for compulsory military training has run against a snag and it may be held up until later. Meanwhile plans are under way for a nation-wide vocational training program for youths, with emphasis on automobile mechanics, and from this training many will be advanced to airplane engine manufacture and servicing of airships on the ground. Vocational schools maintained by school boards throughout the country will be used wherever possible. There will be some compensation for the students during the course of instruction. The courses will be open to several hundred young men in the northwest.
