have no right-of-way, but must wait until they can proceed safely.

Pedestrians have the right-of-way within marked crosswalks or in unmarked crosswalks at the end of a block. While pedestrians who "jaywalk" do not have the right-of-way, their safety remains an obligation of the motorist.

Right-of-Way Rules Reviewed for Safety

Few rules of the road are less understood or more misunderstood than those having to do with right-of-way, according to the legal department of the Oregon State Motor association.

Pointing out that many accidents are caused by motorists who have either a vague or mistaken idea concerning right-of-way rules, the motorists' organization presented the following summary of revisions of the Vehicle Code on the subject:

Drivers, when approaching highway intersections, shall look out for and give right of way to vehicles on the right, simultaneously approaching a given point, whether such vehicle first enters or reaches the intersection or not; provided, that the foregoing provisions shall not apply at any intersection where and when traffic is controlled by traffic control signals or police officers.

Any driver entering an intersection at an unlawful speed shall forfeit any right of way which he would otherwise have under this rule.

When intending to turn left, the driver must give a proper arm signal continuously for the last fifty feet before turning, but the actual turn must not be made until it can be done with reasonable safety. The person turning must yield the right-of-way to all oncoming traffic within the intersection or so close as to constitute an immediate hazard. Thereafter the driver may proceed to make the turn, and oncoming traffic approaching the intersection must permit the turning car to proceed.

Upon entering an arterial or through highway, the driver must first stop and yield the right-of-way to all traffic immediately approaching. Thereafter he may proceed and all vehicles approaching the intersection on the through highway must yield the right-of-way to him.
