Butter Moisture, Fat Control Found

A method of controlling moisture and fat in butter, said to be far more accurate than anything heretofore available, is described in a new bulletin, No. 376, just issued by the Oregon experiment station. This is a highly technical publication containing many mathematical calculations, and designed primarily for the use of those engaged in creamery operations.

In the 11 years of educational butter scoring carried on at Oregon State college, a large percentage of the samples submitted contained an excessive amount of fat while some others contained less than the legal amount. Too much fat in butter means depriving the manufacturer which means the producer in the case of cooperatives, of rightful returns, while too little fat means depriving the consumer of what he pays for.

Under the methods described in the new bulletin the percentage of moisture in the finished butter was within 1-10 of one percent of that desired in 85 percent of the test churnings. The bulletin contains detailed tables for use by buttermakers, which eliminate mathematical work.
