Pork Production Following Trend Forecast by College

The recent pig crop forecast of the United States department of agriculture, showing that farmers have intended to make a further reduction in the pig crop of 1941 compared with 1940 and 1939, confirms the hog outlook issued from Oregon State college last fall, according to L. R. Breithaupt, extension agricultural economist.

To what extent the intentions of hog producers in the corn and hog states may be changed owing to the advice of Secretary of Agriculture Wickard to raise more pigs in 1941 is problematical at this time, although it is possible that the hog situation may be changed materially, especially by 1942.

The Oregon outlook statement which was issued last September, stated that "the outlook for meat animals for marketing during the 1940-41 season appears more favorable than the long-time prospect," as "consumer demand for meats during the 1940-41 marketing season is expected to be stronger than during the 1939-40 season and the total quantity of livestock to be marketed is expected to be smaller."

It was further pointed out in the college statement on the meat animals outlook that the reduction in the meat supply during the 1940-41 marketing year would be due principally to fewer hogs. The supply of hogs for the 1939-40 season was the greatest in five years, following the largest pig crop on record in 1939.

The pig crop of 1939 was estimated at 86 million head. In 1940, the pig crop was reduced to 77 million head, and a considerable further reduction in 1941 was indicated by the pig crop report.

The effect on meat supplies of the secretary's advice to farmers to market more beef instead of continuing to hold back large numbers of cattle for breeding stock, is also problematical. The soundness of this suggestion is not questioned, says Professor Breithaupt, but if followed extensively there will be more meat on the market than appeared probable last September.

On the other hand, consumer demand for meat will probably be even stronger than was anticipated last fall, indicating that meat prices may be expected to hold up well until the supply produced and imported becomes materially greater or consumer purchasing power drops.

STATE CAPITAL NEWS

- Another Building
- First Contingent
- Cost of Relief

By A. L. LINDBECK

Salem.—Construction of another state office building, taxing of trucks and busses, the need for a system of vocational schools, the condition of the state institutions. These were some of the problems discussed by Governor Charles A. Sprague in his message to the lawmakers assembled here for their forty-first biennial session this week.

Calling attention to the fact that two of the largest state departments—the public utilities commission and the unemployment compensation commission—are now housed in rented quarters in downtown Salem the governor suggested that another building be erected in the capitol group opposite the new library building. To finance its construction he suggested a loan from the common school fund.

Pointing out that licenses, fees and gasoline taxes now paid by trucks and busses all go into the construction and maintenance of the highways over which those vehicles operate the governor declared that they should pay their share toward the support of the general government. He recommended that the legislature either impose an additional tax on these commercial operators or capture the present earnings tax which amounts to more than $1,000,000 a year for this purpose.

Touching on the subject of education the governor declared that "a serious deficiency in our school system is in vocational education," and told the legislature that there is need for genuine vocational schools of below-college level located at strategic centers over the state.

Declaring that "the time is at hand for an overhaul" of the veteran's compensation law and recommending an increase in benefit payments to permanently disabled workers and to dependents of deceased workers the governor warned against entering into any program that might endanger the solvency of the insurance fund.

The governor pointed with pride to the balanced budget which he has prepared for the consideration of the legislature and urged that "there must be no extravagance in appropriating state funds lest this balance be wiped out."

The first contingent of Oregon's January quota of trainees will report for duty at the Multnomah county armory next Monday, according to schedules worked out by Lt. Col. Elmer V. Wooten, state director of selective service. These will include men from Marion, Polk, Clackamas and Washington counties. The next day the eastern Oregon contingent, men from Malheur, Baker, Wallowa, Union, Umatilla, Morrow, Gilliam, Grant and Wheeler counties will report together with a few additional trainees from Washington, Clackamas and Clatsop counties. Wednesday's contingent will include trainees from Coos, Curry, Douglas, Jackson, Klamath, Lake, Grant, Tillamook, Yamhill and Jefferson counties. Lane, Benton, Linn, Lincoln and Columbia county will furnish the Thursday quota and the men from Crook, Deschutes, Harney, Sherman and Wasco counties will report on Friday with Multnomah county supplying a few men on each of the five days.

While Governor Sprague is asking the legislature to give him special authority to organize a state guard he has no intention of making use of that authority unless an emergency should arise requiring such an organization, he said. Local and state police have the law enforcement situation well in hand in Oregon and there is no present need for a home guard organization in this state in the opinion of the governor.

The cost of relief in Oregon shows a steady year-by-year increase ever since the present policy was inaugurated in 1933 and the end is not yet in sight, according to figures compiled by the state budget department.

When the legislative session of 1933 created the state's first seven-member relief commission it was with the thought that this body would only supervise the administration of emergency and unemployment relief as financed by county and federal funds. For the purpose of this "supervising" the legislature magnanimously appropriated the sum of $15,000. But the state soon discovered that it was not to get off so lightly and at the special session which convened in November of that same year the lawmakers authorized the expenditure of $3,000,000 for relief, the money to come out of the profits of the state's liquor monopoly which the lawmakers set up at that same session.

Then in 1935 the legislature found it necessary to still further increase the state's share of the relief burden and authorized the expenditure of $5,500,000, also to be taken out of liquor profits. The session of 1937 still further increased this biennial authorization to $6,500,000—$5,000,000 out of liquor profits and $1,500,000 out of the general fund. Due to technical complications, however, the $1,500,000 appropriation was not touched and this amount was recaptured by the 1939 session which added another $600,000 appropriation from the general fund and a $6,500,000 authorization out of liquor profits for a grand total of $8,600,000.

Continuing this upward trend the governor has recognized that the current session still further increase the state's contribution toward relief needs to $9,250,000 of which $6,799,900 is to come from the liquor business and $2,450,100 from the general fund.

Only major amendment to the new parole law to be sought at this session of the legislature will be one requiring committing magistrates to impose the maximum penalty "as provided by law" in all cases, according to Fred Finsley, state parole director. Such an amendment will eliminate the inequalities that now exist in prison sentences, Finsley explained. The longer maximum sentence will not mean longer prison terms but will actually tend to shorten the time prisoners are confined, Finsley said. Under the parole law the new parole board is authorized to release prisoners as soon as they are found to have qualified for parole. Factors taken into consideration in deciding this question include the attitude of the prisoner toward society and his conduct since entering the penitentiary. Under this policy, copied from other states operating under similar statutes, it is possible for a prisoner serving a long sentence to be released on parole before he has completed his first year of penal servitude whereas another prisoner under a much shorter sentence might be detained for a much longer period.

Indicative of the splendid condition of Oregon's young men 71.2 percent of the first thousand men examined in this state under the recent conscription act were found physically fit for military service, according to Lt. Col. Elmer V. Wooten, state director of selective service. Another 15.3 percent were found qualified for limited military service and only 15.5 percent were found to be physically unfit.

20th Short Course For Cannerymen Set

Nineteen years ago Oregon State college drew nation-wide attention by holding the first short course for commercial cannerymen, who were invited to leave their own businesses long enough to come to college and "brush up" on newest methods. Every year since, a similar and enlarged course has been given, and now the twentieth annual Cannerymen and Frozen Food Packers school is announced for February 3 to 15, inclusive.

The course is offered in the food industries department, which is recognized as one of the outstanding research centers in the country in the field of food processing. Courses offered will include instruction in handling frozen fruits and vegetables, a course for food industry field men, a course dealing with fruit and vegetable canning, and a mechanical course in handling modern cannery machinery.
