Wheat Countries All in Same Boat As to Surpluses

American wheat growers are by no means alone in their efforts to control the world wheat surplus in producing exporting countries, according to Will Steen, chairman of the state AAA committee in Oregon, who has recently received word of step being taken in Canada, Argentina and Australia.

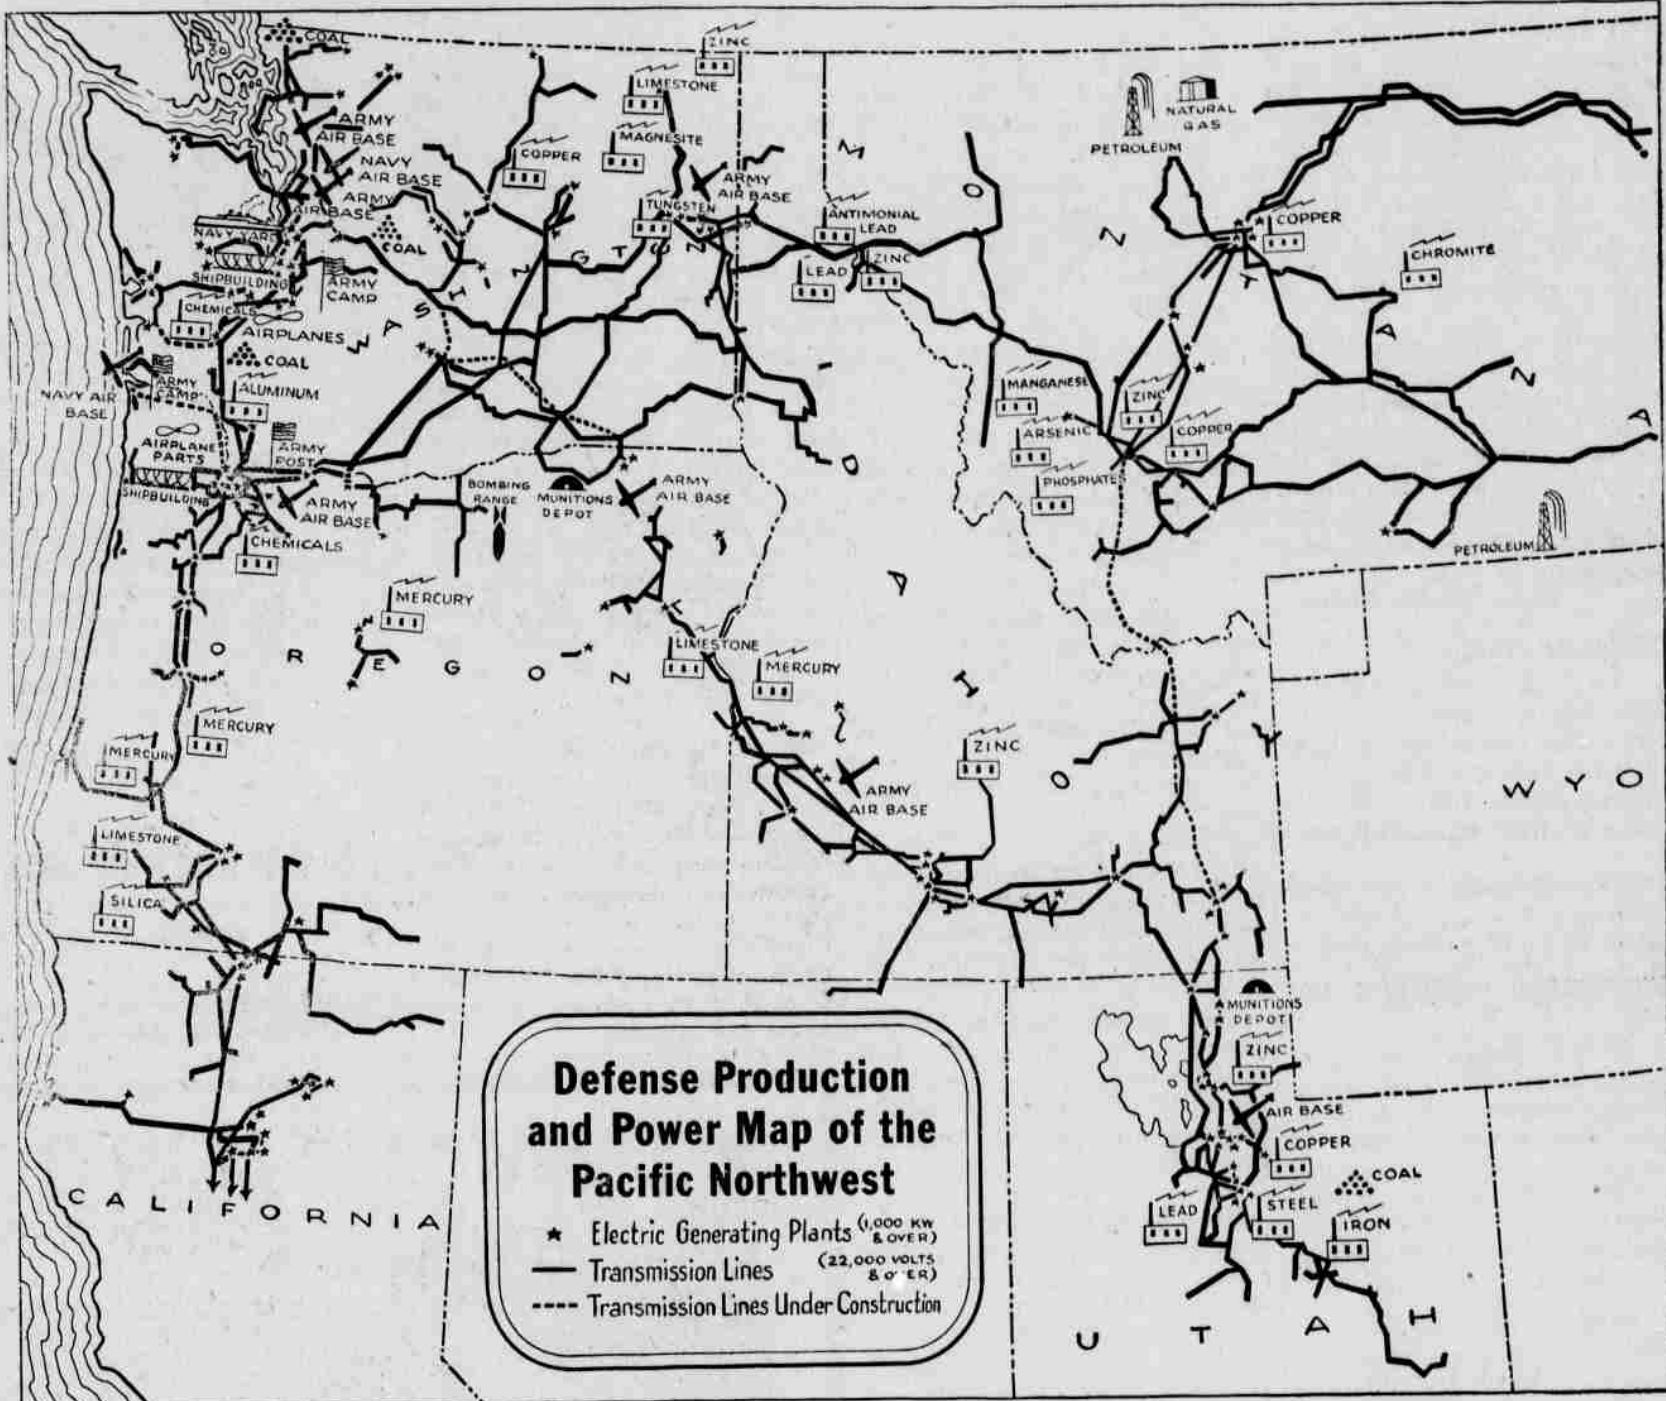

American wheat growers will no doubt be faced with the problem of deciding on the adoption of wheat marketing quotas, says Steen. A tentative date for the election has been set for May 31. If, as expected, the prospective wheat supplies by May 15 are above the limit set in the law of 1938, a marketing quota election must be held. If the quota is approved by growers, the government loans will continue, which constitutes one of America's chief methods of maintaining wheat growers' incomes while exercising a limit on production.

The Argentina and Canadian governments have been protecting their farmers by offering to buy their wheat outright, but this has led to difficulties. Argentine farmers are assured about 55 cents a bushel and Canadian farmers of about 50 cents. Both governments say now they cannot continue to buy unlimited amounts of wheat unless foreign markets re-open. Canadian growers still have much of last year's crop piled out under temporary shelters because supplies far exceed storage

How Power Systems Link Northwest Defense Areas

Avenues by which electricity can be dispatched instantly to any of the Pacific Northwest's defense production areas are shown on this "road map" of transmission lines, compiled by engineers of Pacific Power & Light and Northwestern Electric companies.

Largely developed by the private utility companies of the five states, this network covers an area five times greater than that served by the noted British "grid" system. Extensive power company construction programs since 1918 have vastly strengthened the network and made electricity the Northwest's most mobile defense resource, according to Paul B. McKee, president of the Pacific Power & Light Company.

Generating plants of the region have 2,250,000 kilowatts of capacity, with an additional 400,000 kilowatts under construction.

Nearing completion is the newest strategic link in the network, a 260-mile line which will interconnect the important copper, zinc and lead producing areas of northern Idaho and Montana with the mining and smelting centers of Utah. When this line goes into service it will be possible to shift power back and forth as needed all along the way from the seacoast to Salt Lake City.

Importance of these system interconnections developed by the electric industry is that they insure a continuous and adequate supply of electricity everywhere on the network.

capacity of the country.

Australia guarantees wheat farmers a price of about 56½ cents a bushel on an annual crop of not more than 140 million bushels. In return for this guarantee the growers must agree to market their wheat through the government and carry out certain practices designed to reduce wheat acreage.

In Argentina it is estimated that nearly 200 million bushels of wheat will be available for export in 1941. Canada will have more than 700 million bushels. Both these amounts are considerably larger than supplies on hand a year ago. Because of drought Australia does not have large export supplies, but even so these cannot move freely through military blockades.
