Oregon Rye Grass and Clover Seed Make Hit

Greatly increased outlet for Oregon grown domestic rye grass and crimson clover seed is developing in Kentucky, Virginia, and North Carolina, believes W. L. Teutsch, assistant director of extension at Oregon State college, who visited the region recently with N. C. Donaldson, state AAA executive officer, following the annual national AAA conference in Washington.

Extension trial distribution of rye grass and crimson clover seed was made in that area last year by the AAA in an attempt to encourage the use of winter cover crops to halt the serious effect of erosion. Teutsch and Donaldson found that the seedlings made early last fall had produced heavy cover crops which not only afforded winter protection to the soil but provided good spring pasture, which is much needed in that region. They learned that 26 per cent of the farms in Virginia have no cows even to supply family needs.

The grass and clover mixture is superior in this region as a cover crop to vetch and peas used farther south. This is a new practice in these states, which, if it is generally adopted, holds tremendous possibility for expansion of the seed production industry in this state Teutsch believes.

Copper in Mineral Mix Causes Sheep Deaths

Mineral mixtures containing copper are highly dangerous when fed to sheep, according to results noted in Oregon this year by Dr. J. N. Shaw, head of the veterinary medicine department at Oregon State college. A purebred Lincoln ram that died from causes unknown to the owner was found, upon examination, to have been killed by copper poisoning which affected the kidneys, which were four or five times as large as normal and discolored.

It was learned that the ram had been fed a mineral mixture composed of copper sulphate, sulphur, bonemeal, and salt. Sometimes sheepmen feed minerals containing copper in hopes of destroying parasites in the digestive tract, says Dr. Shaw. Studies made in Texas have proved that such feeding frequently results in severe losses, he said.

Work is dull only to those who take no pride in it.
