Pedestrian Protection — Tunnels Used to Protect Walkers

Several Oregon cities have constructed pedestrian tunnels, or underpasses, for the safety of persons who must otherwise walk across busy streets or highways, one of the most recent projects of this type in Oregon being under the bridge on the coast highway at Depoe Bay, according to the state traffic safety division.

Engineering projects such as these contribute greatly toward pedestrian protection in Oregon and were one of the contributing factors which enabled Oregon to take second place in the nation-wide Pedestrian Protection contest conducted by the American Automobile association last year, safety officials say.

Where such engineering developments are available, pedestrians should make use of them for their own safety, even if it is necessary to go a little out of the way to utilize them.
