Soil Conservation Districts Grow

FROM BLACKBOARD ONTO THE LAND—With maps of actual sample farms (left), Idaho, Oregon and Washington farmers and ranchers are planning their own soil- and moisture-conservation land-use practices on millions of acres in soil conservation districts they have voted under state enabling acts. The districts are not just "paper" organizations (above). One typical undertaking of district farmers is the growing of crops in their rotations to protect and build soil and furnish supplemental feed for profitable livestock raising in these all-out national defense food production days. —Soil Conservation Service photo
