He was a member of the Knights of Pythias. Interment was in Heppner.

Seven Co-op Homes to Help House Co-eds

Oregon State College. — Seven girls' cooperative houses will again be operated here to provide low-cost housing facilities for approximately 200 women students during the next college year, announces Mrs. Buena Maris, dean of women. Six of the cooperatives used this year will be operated again, while the seventh will be at a new location nearer the campus than one used last year.

Increased food costs will make it necessary to raise the price from $180 to $200 a year, but this will still provide board and room for approximately $22 a month.

Use of the seven cooperative houses, 13 sororities, two halls, and the new dormitory annex will make it possible to care for all co-eds next year in college controlled housing facilities, college officials here believe. The only girls who will need to live outside will be those living in town with their own families, those who are married and have homes of their own, or those working for room and board.

Libe Gets Publicity Material Award, OSC

Oregon State College.—The O. S. C. library has just been given one of the publicity awards of the American Library association at the annual convention in Milwaukee. Miss Lucy M. Lewis, college librarian and director of libraries in the state system, was present to receive the award.

The library publicity honor roll was started in 1939 to provide an incentive for more work on the part of libraries in acquainting the public with services available. Types of publicity included are annual reports prepared for the public, handbooks or leaflets for new borrowers, newspaper feature stories and pictures, book lists, exhibits, and miscellaneous new or unusual types of publicity. Five members of the library staff here comprise a public relations committee in charge of this work in the past year, in addition to their regular duties.

Weed Control Progress Subject of Conference

The progress of weed control in the western states will be reviewed at the western weed control conference to be held in Salem Friday and Saturday, June 26 and 27. Specialists from state and federal services throughout the west, including two men from the Oregon State college staff, are on the conference program.

One Oregon State man who will participate is L. E. Harris, associate agronomist, who will speak on "A Selective Spray as a Means of Weed Control." He will recount late experiences with the combination Sinnox-ammonium sulphate spray, which kills broadleaved weeds while stimulating the growth of grains, grasses, flax, and similar crops. The other is Lawrence Jenkins, assistant extension farm crops specialist, who will speak on "Importance of the Extension Service in Organized Weed Control."

Other topics will deal with weed control under war conditions and on reclamation projects, weed control research, cropping methods, and weed control on Indian lands.

CARD OF THANKS

To the many friends and neighbors for their kind expressions of sympathy and beautiful floral tributes during our recent bereavement, we extend our sincere thanks. McCaleb family and Relatives.

How to Make Hay With Few Men is Oregon Problem

Shortage of labor plus inability to purchase new labor-saving machinery are increasing the troubles of Oregon growers in attempting to put up enough hay this season. In some parts of the state extremely poor haying weather has also interfered with early operations. Some suggestions as to how Oregonians can put up hay with fewer men under emergency conditions are given by E. R. Jackman, extension crops specialist at Oregon State college.

In cheating the weather more growers than usual have put up grass silage this year. Some who didn't have silos put it in pits or trenches, while some are merely stacking it uncut and allowing it to form silage that way.

Jackman says that even with stacked uncut grass silage, the loss in feed value isn't half as great as when grass hay is allowed to get so mature that it is worth little more than straw. Any kind of grass silage, however, requires the addition of either molasses or grain to insure the desirable type of fermentation. Any county agent can give directions as to this.

In making alfalfa hay with few men it is possible to cut part of the alfalfa before it reaches bloom stage and keep on until the last is in full bloom, rather than cutting it all at one time in partial bloom. Early cut alfalfa makes the best hay, but too early cutting is hard on the plant, hence it is best to reverse the order of cutting for the next crop, says Jackman. Hauling direct from windrows is another labor-saving device inasmuch as there is nothing gained by shocking and it may even be a detriment in rainy weather.

Other labor-saving ideas, if equipment is owned or can be borrowed, include use of a pickup chopper or pickup baler, or using a power buck rake. A jayhawk stacker, which is a combination buck rake and stacker, may be operated by one man with only one additional man needed on the stack. In arid sections where heavy fall rain is not usually a serious problem, many ranchers merely bunch their grass hay in large piles rather than making regular stacks.

JOHN CRAWFORD ENLISTS
