U.-O. Starting Reserve OSC Circulars Stress 'Less Sugar' Canning

University of Oregon, Eugene, July 2.—The University of Oregon next year expects to enlist every qualified student in one of the military reserve programs now available at the university and by enlistment enable the student to continue his education until called into active service, it was announced by Dr. Carl F. Kossack, chairman of the newly formed bureau of military information and placement.

This program is a direct outgrowth of a joint request by the army and the navy for the university to continue and also to expand its work in training officers and specialists for the war effort.

A part of freshman week at the opening of fall term will be given over to the bureau for presenting information on the various reserve programs to entering freshmen. Students will be given a series of tests to determine their aptitudes and university physicians will give them examinations to determine any physical deficiencies which would bar them from any particular service.

"It is the aim of the bureau to aid in placing students in the proper military reserve program according to their special abilities, their physical qualifications and their personal preferences," Dr. Kossack said.

Open to students are four programs of officer-training and two of special services. They are as follows: Army reserves, offering both basic and advanced courses; army air corps reserves, leading to commissions as flight and ground officers; marine corps reserves; naval reserves, with three programs—V-1 basic naval officer training, V-5 flight officer training, and V-7 deck and engineer officer training; CPT, both flight and ground school courses; and scientific research training.

Three more bulletins and circulars dealing with home food preservation and sugar conservation have just been issued at Oregon State college, to be added to the growing number of aids for the homemaker's kitchen "office."

A new printed bulletin entitled "Home Food Preservation" covering canning, drying, and salting, is by Lucy A. Case, extension nutritionist, and is published as extension bulletin No. 596. With a previous bulletin on "Food Preservation by Freezing," it provides the latest guide on the current drive for maximum home food processing.

How to save sugar when preserving fruits by canning and freezing is covered from slightly different angles in two recent publications. One, by E. H. Wiegand and Gladys Hedlund of the food industries department, regards the results of recent tests made with the use of dextrose, glucose, and honey, in addition to ordinary cane or beet sugar.

Dextrose is a pure simple sugar made from corn and obtainable under several trade names. Glucose, or corn syrup, was formerly abundant on grocers' shelves in either the white or brown form, but both it and dextrose are less abundant for the time being because of the increased demand.

Because of its heavy density, corn syrup is best diluted when used for canning or freezing, the circular points out. The amount of honey usable in canned or frozen fruit is limited because of the intense flavor it imparts. Tests indicated that it is best used in combination with other sugars.

A second circular issued as a home economics extension mimeograph is by Lucy A. Case, extension nutritionist, and Thomas Ornsdorff, associate professor of food industries. It reviews the various strengths of syrup used in canning and tells how to prepare these, giving measurements in simple terms. Hints on how to obtain maximum sweet taste for a minimum of sugar are included.

Copies of all three of these publications may be obtained at any county extension office or direct from the college.

APPLES SUBSTITUTE SWEETS

Spokane, Wash. — "Apples carry their own sugar," says a recent bulletin of the Washington State Apple Commission, "it is interesting to observe that about 15.4 per cent of the average apple is solid matter. The remainder is water. Of this solid matter a small amount is protein, fat, fiber, and minerals and the remainder or about three fourths is sugar.

Therefore, no one needs to starve for sweets so long as one has apples."
