Cantaloupes Good And Good for You; Help Conserve Sugar

Now that Oregon grown cantaloupes are about to reach the market consumers can contemplate their use with more than the usual relish, for they are one answer to sugar rationing problems and are now given an important place nutritionally, says Miss Lucy A. Case, specialist in the O. S. C. extension service.

Cantaloupes may be used either as a breakfast fruit or a dessert without the use of any sugar, a fact certain to add to their popularity, says Miss Case. The deep yellow flesh of most varieties indicates a source of carotin, which in turn is a source of vitamin A for the body. The flesh is also as good a source of vitamin C as tomato juice, pound for pound.

Picking a good cantaloupe has impressed some as a near approach to a lottery, but there are a few methods by which one can lift it somewhat out of the realm of chance. One rule is that "your nose knows"—if it smells good it is good.

If the smell test leaves some doubt or has failed at times, the eyes can help out. The quality of any melon is best if picked at the right time. For a cantaloupe this means when its stem loosens naturally. A melon picked at that stage will have a clean scar rather than a torn stem hole or part of the stem left on. Those shipped long distances are seldom picked at this ideal stage.

Those who know their melons also say that a good one is firm and well netted. The blossom end opposite the stem will be firm and show no paleness, while a slight golden color will be seen through the netting covering the melon.

Overmature melons can be easily detected as they are usually definitely yellow and soft. Bruised cantaloupes are also to be avoided except at bargain prices permitting some discarding, as are those that are shriveled or that have decayed spots.

These signs vary somewhat with variety, as indicated by the excellent quality of the big Oregon Spear melons that hide a thick, rich flesh under a most unattractive exterior.

OSC Travel Cut Aids Rubber Saving Move

Oregon State College—In three ways, directly and indirectly, this institution has joined in the rubber conservation program. Directly, the campus contributed 2634 pounds of scrap rubber gathered from farms, shops, laboratories and elsewhere.

The experiment station finally managed to obtain 21 rebuilt bicycles which are now being used by station scientists in directing research work on parts of the station land and laboratories within pedaling distance of the campus, thus replacing about 10 cars.

The extension service has just reported that for the three months of April, May and June the central staff cut car mileage by 45 per cent by using other means of transportation and eliminating trips entirely when possible. In adapting its program to wartime conditions the extension service is using every means of carrying out its activities with a minimum travel both for the staff and the people on the farms.

State Fair Definitely Cancelled This Year

The 1942 Oregon state fair, holding of which has been like Finnegan—off again, on again—is now definitely off. This announcement was made following a recent conference between fair officials and the governor and puts to an end any more consideration of the fair.

The only remnant of past fairs will be the 4-H club fat stock sale, which will be conducted at the fair grounds with only the buyers and owners present.

Reasons for cancelling the 1942 state fair are several, chief of which are the desire to cooperate with the request of Joseph Eastman, defense transportation director, to conserve rubber; the fact that the fair grounds is occupied by soldiers who may or may not be there for some months; and the fact that there is a serious shortage of farm and harvest labor.
