

Summary of Farm Plans Shows War Goals Approached

The blueprint for 1943 production from Oregon's biggest "war plant" is rapidly nearing completion, R. B. Taylor, chairman of Oregon's USDA war board, announced this week in a progress report on the state's food-for-freedom farm mobilization.

The farm plan sign-up phase of the mobilization drive is about 80 percent completed, Taylor reports, with nearly 40,000 Oregon farmers having recorded both their production plans and needs.

Farmer's intentions, as expressed on these signed farm plans, show that Oregon will go over the top on three important war crop goals, will make substantial increases in others, and will continue a high output of livestock products. While farmers are thus planting and planning in terms of victory, they admit that final success depends much on the amount of help they get from the cities in caring for and harvesting these record plantings, Taylor reports.

The preliminary summary shows that 45,000 acres of potatoes will be planted, as compared to the goal of 44,000—or 17 percent increase over 1942. The dry edible pea goal calls for 28,000 acres, with the farm plan sign-up indicating about 35,000 acres. Intended plantings of flaxseed, a vital oil crop, total over 7,000 acres, or nearly four times the 2,000-acre goal.

Dry beans are lagging short of the goal, with only 3,000 of the 5,000 acres pledged. Plantings of tomatoes, peas, snap beans, sweet corn, carrots, table beets and cabbage for both processing and fresh sale total 53,472 acres, a substantial increase.

Tabulations for livestock and poultry are not yet complete, but first summaries from counties reporting show increases in hog production will probably exceed the 15 percent goal. Indicated numbers of turkeys, chickens for meat and hens for laying to be raised in 1943 are well above the goals, but reports from producers indicate that this production may depend on soy bean meal and wheat being available at moderate prices. Reports from 26 counties show 24,000 more milk cows and heifers on hand than at this time last year.

Information has also been obtained on the farmer's production needs and is being used by war boards, the Extension service and other agencies in rationing the increased amounts of farm machinery, formulating programs to recruit farm labor, developing machinery and truck cooperative pools, and in seeking local solutions to other production problems.
