Mrs. America Meets the War

Enough rentile leather for more than one million pairs of shoes for women and girls has been made available by an amendment to a war production order. Previous WPB conservation orders limiting colors of leather for shoes resulted in a freeze of genuine and imitations reptile leather in the hands of shoe manufacturers, and tanners. However, the amendment makes it possible for this type of leather finished prior to October 16, 1942 to be used, but the reptile leather cannot be combined with other types of leather. Another feature of the amendment prohibit the manufacture of leather bows for shoes.

Mrs. America can be certain of obtaining useful and well-wearing types of blankets despite the War Production Board Conservation Order reducing the variety and sizes of cotton, rayon and wool covers. No blankets will be made longer than 84 inches except white cotton sheet blanket which are limited to 95 inches in length. Each line of blankets is also limited to no more than four colors plus white, and the multidesign blankets are restricted to combinations which do not take more than four color plus white. Before the order, a single line had as many as 15 different colors. It is expected that the number of blankets produced will be increased by the material savings of the conservation order.

despite mileage rationing, just as long as it's Mrs. America's Junior. For the WPB has allowed the production of baby carriages to be increased to match the demands of the war. Strollers, baby walkers, and sulkies also are permitted to be manufactured by June 30.

Used washing machines have become so valuable ince production of new models stopped that the OPA has set dollars and cents maximum prices on all sales of used washers by individuals and dealers alike. The regulation, which became effective May 3, also sets a ceiling on rental charges of used washing machines. The new price ceilings should eliminate any excessive prices which might be as- cause of a heavy demand for this scarce equipment.
