Home soap-making is an indirect blow at our armies in the field. For they are utterly dependent upon the steady flow of munitions which, in turn, depends upon the production of glycerine from salvaged waste fats. Remember, too, that not only the men in the front lines would suffer from a shortage of fats, but also the wounded and the sick in our military hospitals.

Orson D. Munn

For glycerine is an essential ingredient in the surgical dressings, antiseptics and burn jellies which may be so essential to their recovery. For example, glycerine is used as a base for the sulphamide ointments which are so valuable in preventing infections. Few persons realize that a shortage of fats might well be as disastrous to our war effort as a series of major defeats. However vast our manufacture of armaments, whatever all-time records of war production we achieve — all will be useless, unless we have enough fats to make the munitions for our weapons. Fats are the source of most glycerine, and glycerine is a basic essential in the manufacture of munitions.

If this realization were general, we should not see patriotic American women making their own soap and thus depriving their country, at a crucial hour, of the chief source of her munitions supply. In recent articles, I have urged the saving of waste fats by the housewife, and their delivery to a local meat dealer, from whom they are collected for the Government's fat salvage campaign. I have warned of the vital need that American housewives everywhere cooperate with this campaign. Today, with the turning point of the war apparently at hand, and our own ever deeper involvement, the same warning applies with double force. Home soap-making operates against our cause in two evil ways. It takes waste fats directly out of the Government's fat salvage campaign, and it also decreases the manufacture of commercial soap, which is the largest single source of the nation's glycerine supply. Therefore, it is not an exaggeration to say that the home-making of soap tends to sabotage our war effort. At this time, there is no patriotic ground upon which the practice can be defended, nor is there any basis of common sense for it.

Commercial soap is inexpensive and generally excellent in quality. Homemade soap is false economy. It is likely to contain free lyes, highly damaging to skin and fabrics. Thus it is in reality far from being an economical product. The apparent initial saving of a few pennies is likely to be more than offset by the damage done to bodies and to clothing. It is also costly in its assault upon self-esteem. No woman who values good looking hands should subject them to the ravages of home-made soap.

One would like to believe that every American woman, once she knows the facts, will cooperate with her country and its defenders in their hour of need. Most of us would hesitate to believe that any American woman would trade her opportunity to do this, for a possible saving of a few pennies. If we are right, home soap-making will cease.
