Blankenship Ends Work at Columbia U

A. H. Blankenship writes that he has completed his work at Columbia university and has taken the task of setting up a new educational system at Knoxville, Tenn., or near there. The locality is a new city laid out according to the latest thing in city planning. The school system will have one high school and three elementary schools and will house some 2000 or more students. These young people will make up a select group whose parents are highly trained technicians, scientists and military officers.

This new town is the scene of a highly important government project—one of the major federal projects in the United States—and Blankenship is faced with the problem of securing some 70 teachers at salaries ranging from $1900 to $3000.

Mrs. Blankenship and the children are remaining in New York until a house is ready for them in Tennessee

HOME MADE STRAW SPREADER

Saving straw is a proved conservation practice for increasing Western farmers' war-time food production. A home-made scatterer on the combine at harvest time makes it easier to handle the straw and stubble at plowing time. Crop residues used as mulch, instead of being burned or turned completely under, help to prevent erosion and to keep up soil productivity. For additional information on building this or a similar spreader, see your County USDA War Board. Soil Conservation Service Photo.
