

Former Resident Dies at Enterprise

News of the death of Fred W. Falconer was contained in a dispatch to the Oregonian from Enterprise Wednesday. Death came suddenly Tuesday at his ranch a few miles out from Enterprise. He was 62 years of age and is survived by the widow, a son and two grandchildren.

Fred Falconer was a resident of Morrow county for several years, disposing of his interests at Boardman and near Heppner last fall to Bruce Dennis; taking some of the Dennis interests in Willowa county in exchange. He was a colorful character of Oregon range life. Graduate of an Iowa normal school, he headed for Oregon with the idea that he might teach. This idea gradually vanished as he neared his destination and he had not been in Enterprise long before he took a job as herder. He was then about 18 years old. In a year or two he had made up his mind to go into the sheep business and worked on a share basis for William Makin. This partnership ran for some time and later he joined forces with J. H. Dobbin, another up and coming young stockman. Finally Falconer took off by himself and soon became known as one of the Oregon sheep kings. At the time of America's entrance in the first world war he was a big operator and by 1920 he branched out still farther by buying the Cunningham Sheep and Land company of Pilot Rock. This venture was not as successful as his former operations but he managed to salvage enough to make other trades finally acquiring the Morrow County properties.

Falconer was a past president of the Oregon Woolgrowers association.
