New Zealand . . .

Roughly speaking, with the exception of the radio facilities and air travel facilities, I would place the physical condition of the country as somewhat akin to 1915-1920 America.

A big qualification here lies in the fact that there is no ugliness or slum-like condition in New Zealand. All of the simple facilities are nicely kept with gardens—fruit and vegetable—everywhere, fore and aft, of every cottage.

I am not sure whether the regenerative capacity, from the economic point of view, is sufficient to produce the modernization necessary to come up to or keep abreast of the times. Industry there, like other things, is leveled off with many small factories, again similar to America in its 1915-1920 stage.

The other approach that might be helpful in an effort at evaluation of the New Zealand experiment is to look at things through the eyes of the New Zealander. If he likes it, why should we worry or give him a lower score simply because he lacks our gadgetry.

There is much self-conscious defensiveness among New Zealanders when talking to Americans as to the differential implied by the physical picture that I have described. Many business men are heard to criticize their government, much as in this country. It is significant, however, that many business men voted against their own candidate and for the return of Peter Fraser, the labor Prime Minister at the general election. They said to each other, "We are not sure our people can handle labor the way the Prime Minister can."

Much time is had for simple outdoor pleasures in New Zealand. The lack of gadgetry does not handicap this. There are long week-ends for fishing in the magnificent trout streams and lakes and in the sea. Much time is spent at the shore in simple cottages referred to as "batches". There are race meetings in normal times somewhere in the country every day in the year. Major race meetings in an area produce the equivalent of a week's holiday.

In spite of self-conscious defense by New Zealanders, I think that they like their country and way of life very much.

In spite of all this, the country does stand at crossroads politically and a swing back of some degree is now in the making. In the latest general election the labor government was returned to power by a narrow margin of a few seats, and the trend is such that the next government will almost certainly not be labor.

Great problems face the country, largely due to its unselfish performance in this war. It owes England an enormous sum, relative to the New Zealand economy. In addition, there is a large book debt to the U. S. A., on account of lend-lease. Taxes cannot be increased—nor borrowings.

There is ferment due to the infiltration of new people and ideas incident to the war. It is too early to predict the results of all this but since there are two major reasons for interest in New Zealand, it will be worth our while from the viewpoint, both of friendly interest in their experiment and for the thrilling new scenery, to go to New Zealand. I think we should help them solve their problems when they want our help, and should observe, for our own benefit, the working out of their ambitious socialist republic.
