Our HARVESTED TIMBER LAND
GOES Back to Work....

Our harvested timber land . . . commonly called "cut-over" land . . . is a producing area. Actually it will probably grow more new wood in the ten years after cutting than in the ten years preceding the last harvest.

This is true because removal of slow-growing mature trees gives young, fast-growing stock a chance to develop rapidly. Harvested timber land need not be idle, abandoned land. More often now it is an active, working forest comparable to a field after the corn is cut.

. . . but, crop cycles in trees do not just happen. We plan for them by careful logging, leaving of seed sources, and fire protection.
